Communicating and mainstreaming gender equity for achieving the Sustainable Development Goals

Despite playing a central role in land use management and conservation, women in forested landscapes – especially those from indigenous communities or ethnic minorities – are often excluded from decision-making processes.

Communication is a powerful tool to promote gender equity, address informational asymmetries between women and men, and challenge and transform unequal gender dynamics and power relations.

Join us as we generate insights into the role of information and communication to promote women's increased participation and empowerment in sustainable forest management.
